| This lecture discusses an alternative theoretical framework for sustainable development of rural communities in East and Southeast Asia. The endogenous self-organization that functions as a substantial social unit for rural development would be the focus of the discussion. To accomplish this purpose, some cases from each country would be introduced and interpreted in an alternative way. Also, some development strategies will be introduced, while the main agenda should be given on empowering the local people for sustainable rural development. | | |
