課程描述 Course Description
Globalization along with improved mobility and connectedness has driven the rapid expansion of modern tourism systems since the industrial revolution. The same force driving tourism growth has also substantially challenged the ability of tourism systems to remain resilient. The challenge is complicated by increasing disruptions from natural and human-made events (e.g., climate change, natural disasters, political instability and terrorism, threats to public health).
課程目標 Course Objectives
Globalization along with improved mobility and connectedness has driven the rapid expansion of modern tourism systems since the industrial revolution. The same force driving tourism growth has also substantially challenged the ability of tourism systems to remain resilient. The challenge is complicated by increasing disruptions from natural and human-made events (e.g., climate change, natural disasters, political instability and terrorism, threats to public health).
This course is designed to nurture students' ability to 1.demonstrate a critical understanding of the concepts of tourism resilience and vulnerability and associations with sustainability at the individual, organizational, and destination levels; 2.illustrate knowledge of how various sources contribute to vulnerability in tourism systems 3.apply ethical and managerial considerations to assessing and developing the resilience capacity of tourism system systems.
